Text:

When we talk about a language, we don't have to keep in mind that it is compulsory the possession of where it originates. Every language has a origine, but which can be learnt and spoken anywhere provided the need arises. For example, the French language is not only spoken in France, or Arabic in Saudi Arabia. In the United States of America, in Australia, in New Zeland, in most of Canada and some parts of the world. English is spoken as a first language.

So, it will not be reasonable to imagine that the language belongs to one specific country regarding to its speaking or need. It is true that the English language is the most important and the most international in speaking in the world, but Chinese outnumbers it because of the population of that country.

An Egyptian and a Chinese meeting fro the first time will express themselves in English. A pilot of German plane approaching the Charles De Gaulle airport will use English for landing instructions. Malayans lecture have their address in English with Malayan students in Kuala Lampur. People in Africa find English an important tool to master, not merely it is the British or American language, but because it provides ready access to the world scholarship and trade.

Millions of men and women in four continents have English as thier mother tongue and millions of people use it as a second or foreign language. This shows us an idea of what the English language is all about today around the globe. We can then assume that a language is for those who need it and use it to carry out their specific needs.
