Text: UNICEF: Mali's instability increases health crisis for children and mothers.

Bamako, 22 May 2012- UNICEF officials are warning that the crisis in the North of Mali has dramatically increased the risks from diseases such as cholera, measles and polio and could increase maternal and infant deaths. UNICEF Bamako Health Manager George From Ameh says the risks of the spread of vaccine-preventable diseases such as polio and measles have increased. A scheduled polio campaign failed to take place last week in the North, and with people moving across borders, the disease risks being imported from neighboring countries where there are cases.

More than half of all health facilities have been vandalized and the number of health professionals in down to an estimated 18-27 per cent of previous levels. There is also concern about a lack of skilled care for women during pregnancy and childbirth, increasing the risk of maternal and new-born deaths. Nicolas Osbert, Manager for Water, Health, Sanitation and Hygiene in UNICEF Bamako says a rise in cases of cholera is also likely.

In 2011, 55 people died from more than 1,300 cases in five regions: Gao and Timbuktu in the North; Ségou and Mopti in the center; and Kayes in the West. By far the largest numbers - 1,000 cases- were in the North. Cholera is endemic in the country and with municipal water supplies in the North hit by a scarcity of fuel, UNICEF is preparing for a rise in the numbers of cases.
